Introducing Rabbits to Furry Friends

By Shawnna Lemerise, Stephanie Lodge and Stephanie Ash

Rabbits and cats and dogs, oh my! Far from being mortal enemies, rabbits and other animals can live together harmoniously when introduced properly. Introductions between rabbits and other pets may take time and lots of patience. Safety should always be the priority and supervision is always recommended whenever rabbits and others have free roam of the home.

Rabbits and Cats – By Shawnna Lemerise

Introducing rabbits to cats must be taken with great caution due to cats’ predatory nature. But like any interspecies friendship, cats and rabbits can become the best of friends. You must take into consideration:

- The cat’s personality.
- Whether the cat is indoor or outdoor. Outdoor cats are more skilled in hunting and may be more in tune with their predator instincts, while indoor cats who are more social with humans may be better candidates.
- How the cat interacts with other animals. Observe how the cat interacts with other family pets or reacts to animals outside the window.
- A cat’s teeth and nails, even while used in play, can be life-threatening. The key is to be aware that a cat may view the rabbit as prey, which could be fatal.

Once you have made your best judgment on compatibility, the next step is to introduce them slowly. Ensure that the rabbit’s safety is not compromised and that the rabbit is not frightened. Have the rabbit in a play pen, with somewhere to hide if she gets scared. Let the cat inside the room and see how they react, but do not just leave them free together right off the bat. Take things slowly, and see how they react to each other. At some point, you may feel comfortable letting them in the same room together and seeing how they get along. Do not leave them alone together; their interactions should always be supervised.

After my rabbit and cat were introduced, my cat responded to the rabbit with aloofness. He simply was not interested. I let them in the same room together and soon my rabbit followed the cat around. The cat seemed annoyed by his new shadow, but they did not fight. I only allowed them out while supervised, but was comfortable enough to feel that the cat would not attack the rabbit. One day, I was surprised to see the rabbit jump on the couch and lie down with the cat. My cat did not get up, but actually accepted the bunny and started to groom him! However, not every situation will end this way, and if the cat shows any interest in hunting the rabbit, they may need to be kept apart in order to ensure the rabbit’s safety.

Rabbits and Dogs – By Stephanie Ash

Introducing a rabbit to a dog is a delicate process that requires homework before the dog (or rabbit) is ever brought into the home. Whether you have a resident dog or are adopting a new pup, it is important to gauge the personality of the dog before introducing him to a rabbit. Is the dog prey driven? Does the dog like to chase rabbits in the yard? Does the dog play rough with the cat? Although “yes” answers to these questions are not...

Artist Spotlight – Christy Monson Conner

By Stephanie Lodge

One of my favorite new artists and also dedicated animal lover is Christy Monson Conner, owner of Plaid Rabbit Designs. Many of you know Christy from her painted gourds at the annual Midwest BunFest in Columbus. I was re-introduced to her incredible talent through Facebook, where Christy posts her beautiful paintings. After seeing a spectacular garden flag of her bunny muse Pinki Larue, I realized I HAD to have a flag too. (See my Greensby flag below.) Luckily for me, Christy takes custom orders. In addition to garden flags, she likes creating art in other media, including watercolor, acrylic, and even stained glass mosaics. She also creates art from wood and carved gourds. Christy is truly jack(rabbit) of all trades!

Christy has had pet rabbits since 1997. She founded Plaid Rabbit Designs in 2003 when she was selling her art to local businesses and participating in craft shows. Since then she has expanded her business greatly through word of mouth, her webpage, and Facebook. When Christy isn’t busy creating, she is a full-time bunny mama to her inspiration and assistant Pinki. A foster failure, Pinki was rescued by Christy when he was living in a tiny cage in a carport, behind so many boxes you would never have known he was there. Taking him was the best decision she ever made! Christy also volunteers with the Bunderground Railroad and has invented a bunny treat call the Critical Crisp. This treat was designed specifically for a friend's bunny who was going through chemo and losing her appetite.

If you are interested in commissioning a portrait, have an idea for bunny-themed artwork, or need to order Critical Crisps, contact Christy at plaidrabbitdesigns@gmail.com or message her through Facebook (search Christy Monson Conner or Plaid Rabbit Designs Bunny Art).

necessarily an indication a dog/rabbit relationship will not work, it is a good indicator of how slowly the introduction must go and the safety precautions that must be used.

Another personality question to answer before introducing the dog to the rabbit is: how much energy does the dog have? If your pooch is playful and likes to run around the house, it may be a good idea to take Fido for a walk around the block before trying to introduce him to the rabbit. A rambunctious dog with a lot of pent-up energy may scare your rabbit and make for a bad first impression.

The first step in introducing a dog to a rabbit is to confine each pet to a safe location while each adjusts to the other being in the home. When I adopted my French Lop, Sassy, we let our dog, Salsa (a 70 lb. boxer/mix), keep free range of the home while we confined the rabbit to our office. After a couple of days, we pulled a “switcheroo” where we let Salsa into the office and Sassy roam the rest of the house. The two did not meet during this time, but they were able to sniff each other’s belongings. I do not recommend that the dog meet the rabbit through the rabbit’s cage or penned area. Some dogs can become barrier aggressive or frustrated when they cannot get to something they are interested in, which can manifest in growling, snarling, barking and charging the kennel while the rabbit is inside, even though this aggression may not occur without a barrier. This type of negative interaction can be difficult to overcome and can raise hurdles to a successful relationship.

After letting Sassy and Salsa become accustomed to each other’s smell, my husband, Tom, and I sat in the living room with both pets. I would hold Sassy while watching TV and Salsa would be at the other end of the couch with Tom. We did not let them meet yet -- we wanted to give them time to adjust and also to associate good things with each other's presence. While on the couch, both pets would get lots of love and treats to positively reinforce being around each other.

Once Sassy and Salsa seemed to be comfortable in each other’s presence (Sassy and Salsa would both fall asleep under their blankets) we decided to let them formally meet. Tom took control of the dog (I would recommend either a leash or grabbing hold of the collar) and I held Sassy, who was securely wrapped in a blanket. We were both prepared to separate them quickly if either should show any signs of stress or aggression. To our relief, Sassy and Salsa sniffed at each other and Salsa began to groom Sassy! We did not let the interaction last too long the first time and ended it on a positive note.

As time passed, we allowed Sassy and Salsa to spend more time together, first on leash and in controlled environments and then, once we learned to trust the dog with the rabbit, off leash. Even though Sassy and Salsa are great friends now and both have free roam of the house (they like to snuggle up together in the office while Tom works from home), we still supervise them whenever they are together since it only takes a moment of exuberant play to put the rabbit in a compromising situation. Another thing we have done to lessen any tension and help foster a positive relationship between the dog and the rabbit is to give each pet their own space. Sassy rules the office and we have installed a dog gate with a special “rabbit door” that we keep open so Sassy can always make a safe retreat from the dog. Salsa rules the upstairs of the house and her crate downstairs so she also always has a place to retreat from the rabbit (Sassy likes to chase her around the house!).

Introductions between rabbits and dogs can take a long time and require patience. This process can last a few days or a few months depending on the personality of the pets involved. It is important to always remember that even with the most persistence and patience, some rabbits and dogs may never be able to roam freely together. Safety should always be your first priority.

Rabbits and Guinea Pigs – By Stephanie Lodge

There are both positives and negatives in pairing rabbits and guinea pigs. While the two have quite a bit in common, there are also some major differences.

- Both are herbivores.
- Both are avid hay eaters.
- Both are social creatures.
- Guinea pigs require extra vitamin C which is obtained from their specially-formulated pellets and veggies.
- Our pigs are not potty trained like the rabbits, so they end up making a mess.
- A rabbit’s strong back legs could accidentally hurt a pig.
- They speak different languages.

With both rabbits and guinea pigs at home, I have found that some of my bunnies like the piggies, while others couldn’t care less. Our foster Mischa happens to really enjoy spending time with our pig, Bear. We give them time to socialize through a pen wall adjacent to Mischa’s enclosure. They have great fun running about next to each other. A pig could be the answer for a lonely bunny who doesn’t get along with other rabbits. On occasion we have let the two hang out together in the same pen. Not surprisingly Bear’s first priority is eating the bunny’s food.

Rabbits and Stuffed Friends – By Shawnna Lemerise

If you haven’t been successful in bonding your bun with living animals, or if your rabbit is antisocial, a stuffed friend may be the best solution for keeping your bun company when you aren’t around. Just like with live animal introductions, safety is important when introducing rabbits to stuffies. Toys should not have loose strings, little pieces the buns may eat, and they should not be filled with beads. It helps to pick a stuffed animal that is about the same size as the rabbit – not too big and not too small. I also like to use stuffed friends shaped like rabbits, but one of my buns is friends with a raccoon.

In order to help the rabbit bond with the toy, collect some of the rabbit’s fur that has been shed and rub it on the stuffed animal. If bun lets you, you may even use the stuffed animal to pet your bunny. This not only helps the rabbit associate the stuffie with warm and fuzzy feelings, but it also helps the toy smell like your bun. Bunnies often rub their scent on things that belong to them, so it will help them view the toy as their own. Some buns may chew apart the stuffed animal. In this case, remove it and perhaps try a different toy. If the rabbit licks or grooms his stuffie, then you have success! The rabbit has adopted the toy. Bun may practice grooming the stuffed animal, move it around the cage, and even snuggle up to it.

Closing

Rabbits can build wonderful loving relationships with cats, dogs, guinea pigs, and even stuffed animals; however, some pets may not get along despite your best efforts. Going slowly and having lots of patience are key ingredients to a successful introduction and a “hoppily” ever after!

Somebunny Needs YOU!

Nikki is a Dutch/English Spot mix with unique black and white markings on her fur. The most adventurous of all the Indiana babies, she is friendly and will be your best friend (for the low, low price of one baby carrot). Please contact Sue Zimmerman (bhrs-sue@ohare.org) 419-355-8433.

Meet Raven, she is a big, beautiful and sweet rabbit with shiny black fur. Although shy at first, she is curious and playful. If Poe had met this Raven, he would have rewritten his poem for her … Quoth the Raven, “my forever home”. Please contact Michele Roth (bhrs-michele@ohare.org) 859-261-0556.

Addison is a young and playful little girl who is always busy. She enjoys head pets, giving kisses, hopping through tunnels, and running the “Bunny 500”. Her adventurous personality makes a large pen a necessity. Addison is a perfect example that small bunnies can have BIG personalities. Please contact Stephanie Lodge (bhrs-stephanie@ohare.org) 216-571-1088.

Bunny is a sweet girl with us since she was three weeks old. She enjoys hanging out in her pen until she gets her courage up to venture out for exploring and binkies. Note the unique marking on her nose. Depending how you look at it, you will either see the head/face of a rabbit or the back profile of a bunny (aka bunny-butt). Here’s a bun who is two-for-one! Please contact Sue Zimmerman (bhrs-sue@ohare.org) 419-355-8433.

Adopted!

Sahara is the center of attention in her new home with Grace DeLong. When she’s not exploring her spiffy condo, she’s soaking up love and cuddles on a favorite lap. ♥ Lop-eared Louise Bailor is enjoying her new home with Hannah Rutledge and Derik Lochotzki. ♥ Charcoal (now Oliver) has a terrific forever home with Megan Kleinert and family. ♥ Lindsay (now Easter) has a “wonderful” new home with the Wunder family of Port Clinton. ♥ Lovely little Mischa has found her forever home with Lisa, Heath and their two children. Congratulations, Bowers family!
Be Somebunny’s Hero
Consider adopting a “less adoptable” rabbit

By Sue Zimmerman

Have you ever noticed in these newsletters and on the Ohare website that some of the same bunnies have been listed for years? Take a look. Read their stories. And ask yourself: “Do I have room in my heart for a bunny who is seeking a permanent home, but may never find one?” Although we love having these buns live their lives here with us, I can’t help but feel sorry for them. They deserve a chance at a forever home and the special bond that comes with adoption.

The Black Bunny Syndrome. More often than not, many great rabbits have been overlooked because people just don’t seem to like pets that are plain black. I am not sure why that is but you will find this to be true in most shelters with dogs and cats as well. Perhaps folks want a bunny with fancier markings? I don’t understand it. These great bunnies have been overlooked simply because of their color.

The white bunny syndrome. Just as with the black bunnies, people seem to have a big hang up about white bunnies with pink eyes. I have been told that their eyes are “creepy” or simply, “I don’t like bunnies with pink eyes.” Of all the bunnies that I have fostered through the years, I have found that white bunnies with pink eyes have the best personalities and are the most cuddly and social.

Leo: Leo arrived in our care in September 2012 and is quite simply “The Perfect Bunny”. He is a snuggle bug who will let you hold him and pet him for hours. Leo is very active and social and loves to visit the other bunnies in the foster room. He is quite fond of doing binkies in front of the female buns. Why has this guy not been adopted yet? Please contact Sue Zimmerman (bhrs-sue@ohare.org) 419-355-8433.

Lacey: Lacey is a beautiful white bun who came to stay with us in May 2014 along with her litter of 7 babies. Lacey is a young adult who is very energetic and curious. She loves free time outside of her pen. Her personality will really flourish when she finds a permanent home. Please contact Sue Zimmerman (bhrs-sue@ohare.org) 419-355-8433.

Bonded Pairs. People often want to have more than one bunny, but bonding two rabbits can be a lot of work. Why not consider adopting two bunnies who are already bonded? The Buckeye House Rabbit Society currently has two bonded pairs looking for their forever homes. These pairs have been together since they were babies and are best pals for life.
Kinsey & Dok: Stephanie Lodge writes --Two of my best fosters have also been one of my most challenging adoptions. In 2013, I took in a momma and her four babies seized from a large hoarding case in Indiana. I still have two of the babies. It’s sad that these two darlings, whom we like to call the “cows” due to their black spots, still haven’t found a forever home. While most people initially want to adopt one rabbit instead of two, many will at some point adopt a friend for their lonely bunny. Two bunnies are not twice as much work, especially if they are already bonded and live together. They are, however, twice as much fun! Please contact Stephanie Lodge (bhrs-stephanie@ohare.org) 216-571-1088.

Barley & Hops: Barley and Hops were found as strays and have been in foster care since November 2011. We have had them since they were little babies. This brother and sister pair are an absolute joy to watch. They love to play and are very social. They have been passed over because of their coloring (see “The white bunny syndrome” above”) and because they are also larger bunnies. I love watching them interact with each other and also with us. There is nothing better that watching 12 pounds of lagomorph leaping through the air in mid binky. Please contact Sue Zimmerman (bhrs-sue@ohare.org) 419-355-8433.

Large Bunnies. Large buns are also difficult to adopt because everyone thinks they want a small bunny. Did you know that bigger bunnies tend to be more docile and calmer than some of the little breeds? Larger bunnies are also a better choice for families with younger children because of their size and mellow personalities.

Please take a closer look at these often-overlooked bunnies. Can you offer a forever home to one of these beautiful creatures who so desperately would like to be adopted? Giving one of them a home also opens a spot for another needy foster rabbit. Can you be some bunny’s hero?
Farewell to Hoppington

By Matthew Hager

It was the best $15 we ever spent.

That’s all my wife, Lindsay, and I paid for Lord Hoppington, a rambunctious black rabbit who we said a tearful goodbye to in March. She – yes, she was technically a Lady, not a Lord – came into our lives at the perfect moment. We had just moved from Ohio to Wisconsin after college, and we were living in a place where we knew no one. Even worse, Lindsay and I had different work hours, which often meant we were alone in our apartment when we weren’t on the clock.

It was not long after we moved to Beloit, a town on the border of Wisconsin and Illinois, that we started spending some of our free time looking at pets. Lindsay grew up with a pet bird, me with my beloved dog, Spydel. We were pet people, and we knew that eventually we wanted to add a furry (or feathered) friend to our lives.

I wasn’t ready when it happened, though. As a sportswriter, I work weird hours. Back in my Beloit days, I worked split shifts – early morning until noon, then early evening until often around midnight. One Friday, after covering a high school football game, I came home to find my wife on the floor unloading boxes purchased from the pet store. Nearby, a head popped out of one of the boxes.

“Who’s this guy?” it seemed like the small rabbit was saying with her expression.

Lindsay just smiled; I remember it clear as day a decade later. She explained that she couldn’t resist. Hoppington, as she would be soon named, was among a group of rabbits at the store – but she was the only one being playful. While the other buns were grouped up in a big, cuddly pile, Hoppington was burrowing by herself and accepting head pets. Lindsay fell in love immediately and made the call to buy her without me.

I wasn’t upset. I had never owned a rabbit, and admittedly, we did not know much about taking care of one before we brought Hoppington home. We learned as we went, did a lot of research and quickly bonded with our bun. She was the perfect companion for that time in our lives, and even though she cost us our deposit – Hoppington loved to rip at carpet, despite the fact that we bought her plenty of toys she could have chewed on instead – we loved her dearly.

After two years in Wisconsin, I got a job back home in Ohio. My wife’s career improved as well. All the while, Hoppington was there for us. She was always happy to accept head pets, especially when I’d find that perfect spot on her jaw line that got her teeth grinding started. Hoppington loved cranberries – craisins, specifically – and baby carrots, but nothing made her more content than spending a weekend morning with us. I’d make breakfast for Lindsay and me, but I wouldn’t forget Hoppington either – especially because she’d hover near the kitchen to make sure I saw her. I’d grab a paper plate and put plenty of leafy greens and a couple of carrots on it. When we ate, she’d eat. Then, if it was a nice day outside, Hoppington loved sitting in a sunbeam on the floor, what we liked to call “sun bun.”
Unfortunately, the last few months were difficult. First, she started to have a leaky right tear duct. Medicine never really cured it, either, but we made it manageable and she never seemed that bothered by it. Then she got syphilis, which was more funny than anything because there were no other bunnies hanging around. Apparently, it was dormant for a long time – probably from her time in the pet store – and did not come out until her immune system was weakened. We did cure that, however, with weekly shots.

But in the end, there was little we could do about her most difficult health issue. During one vet appointment, when we were trying to cure the leaky tear duct issue, the vet noticed that Hoppington’s breathing sounded off, for lack of a better term. Upon further investigation, the vet deduced that Hoppington likely had a tumor in her chest, which became more noticeable in certain situations.

I was heartbroken. We knew that it would eventually kill her. We could see that her breathing was becoming a little more labored day by day. When she exerted herself, she’d quickly get out of breath. It hurt to see sometimes. She still loved pets, loved attention, but eventually she stopped eating as much as she had.

Come March, we knew it would not be long. We might have to make the call to put her down, something that neither of us were wanting, of course. In the end, Hoppington made the call herself. On a rainy Friday evening, shortly after my wife got home from work, Hoppington’s breathing got shallow and slowed. Lindsay sat on the floor with her, held her in her arms and gave her comfort as she left us.

Hoppington waited for Lindsay to get home to say goodbye. It shattered me, I can’t lie. I knew the end was coming, but I still wasn’t ready when it happened. Nor was I ready when we took her back to the vet one final time to say goodbye the next morning. I miss her terribly.

But as the days have passed, things have gotten better. We had Hoppington cremated, and I have to admit – having her home now makes things better. I still miss talking to her, petting her and just having her hanging out nearby when I am at home. But she’s home.

I don’t write this to make anyone sad. I write it to tout Hoppington as a great companion for Lindsay and me. I did not know much about rabbits as pets before Hoppington entered our lives, but if I had it to do over again I’d do the same thing.
